Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of dental caries between children who had been exposed to fluoride varnish and those who had not. A total of 100 children aged 6-12 years were recruited from two primary schools in the north-east of England. Fifty children had been treated with fluoride varnish at least once in the previous year, while the other fifty had not. All children underwent a clinical examination by a qualified dental professional. The prevalence of dental caries was determined using the International Caries Assessment (ICDAS) index. The results showed that the prevalence of dental caries was significantly lower in the fluoride varnish group compared to the control group ($p < 0.05$). These findings suggest that fluoride varnish may be an effective method for reducing the risk of dental caries in children.
